

Music Learning Problem Statement

Author: Sanjana Guzzarlamudi

Problem Statement:

Self teaching musicians don't have an affordable way to keep track of their progress and receive feedback.

Who is experiencing the problem?

The people concerned are those who want to teach themselves how to play an instrument and are low on money and/or time. Examples may be of people who are too busy with work or family or school, who need flexible resources suited to their specific needs and interests.

What is the problem?

The problem is that people struggle to keep accountability with practice consistency, improving on certain skills, and receiving personal feedback based on their updating progress. The lack of money and time makes it so that they are unable to access the advantageous resources that usually accompany the process, like with a teacher or peers.

Where does the problem present itself?

The problem presents itself through people losing motivation to learn new skills because of lack of consistency and assessments.

Why does it matter?

Learning a new skill - in this case, an instrument - is valuable to a person's wellbeing and adds to their community around them. The people who desire to acquire such betterment should be afforded the resources to keep track and reach the goals they are setting for themselves.
